Script de la video

I was working at an office supplies' company, the last job that I had, and I was made redundant. I've only been working there for two months and basically they weren't doing very well. So, they don't... terminated.

There are lots of places you can go to look for a job. Try the job centre, looking online or looking in local newspapers. You can use the phone book to find potential employers in your local area.

Most employers advertise online, so make sure you've got Internet access. Make sure you do your research and find exactly what skills and qualifications you will need before you apply. Try your local library as they often have free Internet access.

Set up an email address with a sensible name so that employers can contact you. Don't forget to update your Facebook, Bebo, mySpace or Twitter profile to boost your online presence.

Get networking

Friends and family may be apt to help so tell them you are looking for work. A professional recommendation can be highly beneficial. Get two decent references from previous employers or college tutors.

Get busy

Doing work experience or volunteering is a great way to show employers that you've got what it takes. You should also register with local recruitment agencies who can ask a copy of your CV.

You should never have to pay a recruitment agency to find you a job.

Chase up your submitted application forms by calling or emailing the company. Cast your net wide and apply for as many jobs as possible. Job hunting can be stressful so do something you are passionate about to keep up your moral. You're likely to be knocked back from time to time so be persistent and don't give up.
